AND DAISY MAKES THREE

"WELL, are you all set for the picnic next Saturday, Pam?" Davy asked.

"Well, the sandwiches aren't made yet, if that's what you mean," Pam laughingly replied. Then she went on, "And, oh, by the way, have you heard the swell news?"

"Maybe Miss Prune-face isn't going to chaperone the school club. Did she break a leg, or something like that?"

Pam said reprovingly, "Oh, goodness, no... you're terrible. But she did tell me this afternoon at school that there's going to be a special attraction at the picnic."

Davy's eyes lit up. "Maybe she's going to dive into the lake at the shallow end?"

Pam tried not to listen to her boyfriend's remarks. "Nope... but Bill's bringing his guitar, and he's going to sing folk tunes. Nancy Sherman has an accordion, and she'll bring that, so we'll be able to do some real country dancing. And Hap Kramer has a piccolo. Can't you just hear the music now?"

Davy pretended to cover his ears. "I sure can. Anyhow, what's so great about being able to play an accordion, or a guitar, or even a piccolo, for that matter?"

"I think it's pretty nice when one's boyfriend or girlfriend is talented!" Pam replied, almost accusingly.

"Now listen," Davy said, rising from the porch chair and leaving, "I'm not being railroaded into becoming a piccolo player, even for you. So long, I've got to run home for supper."

"Well, you needn't be so SARCASTIC!" Pam yelled across the lawn, oblivious to the fact that Davy was already half way home.

Davy didn't phone Pam the next few days. At school she only saw him between classes, and whenever she would try to reach him, he'd slip away quickly, and Pam began to worry.

But one day she found him stuffing a sandwich down his mouth, and he was too busy eating to try and make his escape.

Pam confronted Dave. "You've been avoiding me, Davy Perkins."

"I HAVE?" Davy mimicked, placing his hands on his hips and shaking his head.

"Where have you been these last few days?" Pam asked, curiously.

"Oh, biding my time with another woman."

"ANOTHER WOMAN? Why, you... you..." Pam stuttered.

"You bother me, little one, go away," Davy said, waving her away. "Oh, so now you've found someone else, and I'm nothing any more. All right, smarty, you find yourself another picnic date!" Pam walked away.

She heard him call, "Oh, I already have!" and she tried hard to keep the tears from rolling down her face as she walked to her next class.

Sue sat beside her before the History class started. "What's wrong, Pam? Anything I can do?"

"N-no, n-nothing, thanks. It's just... oh, that DAVY!"

"I'll bet you had a fight with him and he's not taking you to the picnic. Well, gosh, I can imagine how you feel. By this time everyone else is dated up for that picnic. What are you gonna do?" Sue asked.

"Oh, it's not the picnic so much, it's just that Davy has... has... OH... ANOTHER GIRL," Pam cried.

"Another girl? Why, who is it? Someone from school? What does she look like... I'll tear her hair out by the ROOTS," Sue consoled.

"That's just it," Pam explained between sobs, "I've been seeing him all around school, but he's never been with another girl. And he lives almost next door, and I never see him going out at night. I can't understand it. Unless she's some... some HUSSY from out of town... maybe he... OH... WRITES TO HER! Oh, I feel just awful!"

Sue's question about the description of the "other woman" really made her wonder about it. What did this new girl have that Pam needed, to get Davy back?

She HAD to find out, and she set up her own spy system. Every night immediately after dinner, she would station herself at the front window, and watch for Davy to come out of his house. He never stepped out, even once.

"Well, maybe she comes over . . . to . . . to visit HIM!" she thought, getting more curious all the time. But no, she gazed out the window for hours at a time, and no girl even approached the Perkins house. There just simply HAD to be an explanation.

Pam noticed at school that every day, at three o'clock, when classes were over, Davy would rush out of English, which was also her last class, and before the others had time to walk out of the school yard, Davy was almost home. And there he stayed.

"But how can he possibly have another girl when he doesn't STIR from his house, and she never comes over to see him? Only one thing to do," Pam decided, and she tried to catch up with Davy one afternoon. After a vigorous run, she managed to find him.

"Look, Davy . . . I know it really isn't any of my business, but what . . . I mean, who . . . is this 'other woman' in your life?"

Davy looked strange, but he smiled and said, "Well, I won't tell you her name, but she's got real curvy legs, long and slim . . . her teeth are like precious ivory . . . her voice sounds like sweet music . . . and, oh . . . just my slightest touch will make her quiver and sigh. What a dame!"

Pam could take no more, and she left Davy standing there, laughing as hard as he could.

'He's cruel . . . cruel and inhuman, and I . . . I don't care if he has another girl, and I don't care whether she's got nice legs or ugly legs, I wouldn't care if she has beautiful teeth or wears braces on them. He's mean, mean, MEAN!"

Pam ran to her house, and soon found herself on her own bed, crying. She must have been crying for an hour, but suddenly the sound of music drifted in through the window next to her bed. She looked out, but there was nothing. Then she realized that the music came from Davy's house. It was piano music!

"Sooo, his girlfriend is playing the piano down in his cellar. He didn't think it was important for one's friends to be talented, and just listen to that. Why, I'm going to go over there and get a look at those two . . . those two . . . horrible people."

Pam ran downstairs and outside. She came to Davy's house, and stopped, knocking on the door. When Mrs. Perkins answered, she almost pushed her way inside, leaving the woman very puzzled. She hurried down to the playroom-basement, prepared to confront Davy and his new girlfriend. And there they were!

"B-but . . . where is she?" Pam asked, looking around.

"Who? OH, MY DREAM GIRL . . . right here, in front of me."

"H-here? Oh, Davy . . . that wasn't YOU playing the piano? Tell me you weren't!" Pam exclaimed.

"I sure was . . . and meet Daisy . . . my pearly-toothed, curvy-legged, musical voiced, quivering girlfriend. A PIANO!"

Pam could hardly speak. "B-but . . . b-but how come? Why didn't you tell me?"

"It was a surprise, and I was just teasing you . . . you always looked so funny when I mentioned my 'other woman,'" Davy winked.

Davy went on, "... you raved about the talented people coming to the picnic tomorrow, and I didn't want to be left out! Oh, OH . . . OOOOOOOHHHH! It just struck me!"

"What? Oh, no, Davy, you didn't!" Pam howled, doubling up with laughter. "You didn't think you could bring the piano along to the picnic, did you?"

"I never thought of the problem . . ." Davy said, feeling very small. "I just got so enthused with it I didn't think that I couldn't drag a piano along on a picnic like an accordion . . . or a piccolo. Boy, do I feel silly!"

"Well, don't, Davy dear," Pam said, snuggling up beside her boyfriend on the piano bench. "I'd rather not go on the picnic anyhow, if you don't mind. We can just sit here Saturday, and I'll listen to you play for me. Won't it be cozy?"

"Yeah," Davy sighed, "just you, me, and Daisy!"
